INTERNATIONAL: Results of UN Session on Disarmament
The General Assembly has ended the five-week session on disarmament in deadlock, adopting a report that records the lack of progress during the last four years and that promises to continue most issues in other multilateral forums.	.25X1
The session was a failure for most states because the participants were unable to agree either on a review of disarmament negotiations since the first special session in 1978 or on a comprehensive program of disarmament. The chairman's brief report, adopted by consensus, reaffirms the goals and priorities of the first special session but notes increased arms races, military budgets, and use of force.	25X′
The comprehensive program of disarmament, which delegates from many nonaligned nations had hoped would be the highlight of this session, has been referred back to the Committee on Disarmament. The report, which also calls for a third special session at an unspecified date, disappointed many nonaligned nations, some of whom disassociated themselves from it.	25X′
Comment: The session's shortcomings can be attributed primarily to the nonaligned's inability to organize behind specific goals and negotiating tactics. The initiation of the START and INF negotiations eliminated a major target of opportunity, while crises in Lebanon, the South Atlantic, and the Persian Gulf diverted media attention from the session.	25X′
The nonaligned also were surprised and confused by the East-West tensions at the session. While the West maintained unity on major questions, the Soviets made largely ineffective propaganda ploys, including their pledge of no-first-use of nuclear weapons.	[^] 25X′
Nonaligned pressure to discuss the specifics of a proposed comprehensive nuclear test ban will continue at the Committee on Disarmament, which reconvenes within a month. The Soviets may be able to exploit this issue to revive divisions within the West that were papered over during the session.	25X1
